When once an idea took possession of his brain, it grew until it drove out all other thoughts and left him no peace of mind until it was carried into execution. For a day and a night he reflected how best to realize his new project, and ended by putting on his hat and paying a visit to Father Kelly, an influential priest, the head of the Church of St. Lawrence. Father Kelly was a worthy man, endowed with a passionate nature, a fertile imagination, and an overwhelming love for his religion. His contemplative mind led him to look upon religion as the greatest factor in life, without which there could be no happiness here or in the hereafter. He was a man of profound and immutable convictions, prominent among which was, naturally enough, the belief that his church alone held the key...
